TAMPERE, Finland, July 20 — Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union both managed to remain in the Olympic soccer football tournament today because the teams of the two rival Communist countries drew, 5—all, after a hectic match.

It was Yugoslavia all the way until the last quarter-hour. The Tito eleven led by 5 to 1, and it looked as though it couldn't lose. The Russians put on a terrific spurt, however, evening the score with a minute to go.

Those who had come to see blood were disappointed, for play was clean throughout, although at times rough. The fouls, fist fights and stretcher cases that had been predicted did not occur.

The 5,000 fans who had come to watch the encounter in this industrial city, which is regarded as one of the strongholds of Finnish communists, were treated to a good, fair game, and to nothing more. The sympathies of the spectators seemed fairly evenly divided. The deafening cheer that broke out when the Russians drew even would have been accorded to Yugoslavia had their positions been reversed, it is believed.

Yugoslavs Strike Early

The Yugoslavs made the Russians look like bush leaguers in the first half when the Soviet goalkeeper, Ivanov, had to yield three times running. The Yugoslav forwards demonstrated a speed and precision that appeared to disconcert their opponents. The leaders' defense was airtight.

The Russians did not score their first goal until the eighth minute of the second half, after the Yugoslavs had made it 4 to 0. The Russian outside right, Trofimov, picked up a long pass and netted the ball past the Yugoslav goal keeper, Beara.

But Yugoslavia still dominated the field. In the fourteenth minute, the Tito eleven made it 5—1, and kept the ball in U. S. S. R. territory for another fifteen minutes.

Then things began to happen. Perhaps the Yugoslavs were tiring or just became careless, feeling that victory was inevitable. In any event, the Russian team began to play inspired ball. Obviously fighting with a determination born of despair, the Soviet team moved the ball to the Yugoslav side, and there it stayed.

Drop Their Poker Faces

The Yugoslav goal keeper suddenly found himself parrying shots from every angle. Fourteen minutes before the end the score was 5 to 2. Two minutes later it was 5—3 and three minutes before the whistle blew it was 5—4. Then, in the very last minute, a Russian goal scored off a corner made it 5—all and touched off demonstrations of joy probably rare in these cold latitudes.

Even the Russian players dropped their poker faces and danced with glee. The general impression was that the Yugoslavs were tired and a beaten team proved wrong, however. The truth seemed to be that both teams were tired, for neither side could score during the extra thirty minutes of play. If anything, the Yugoslavs had the better of it during the extra period.

After the game, members of both teams shook hands politely, although not cordially, it seemed. As for the Yugoslavs, their chores were not yet over—they went home to answer some 400 wires received from Belgrade during the day, telling them, "You must win."

The referee was Ellis of England. The match will be replayed here Tuesday.
